I promised to write to you following your questions about fisheries enforcement on 13 November. Fisheries enforcement in Welsh waters is carried out by two main groups; the Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) Sea Fisheries Inspectors and the Royal Navy, and Sea Fisheries Committees (SFCs).

Enforcement out to 12 miles is carried out on behalf of the Assembly by the DEFRA Sea Fisheries Inspectors and the Royal Navy. Both enforce UK, EU and Welsh fisheries legislation and are funded centrally. Inspections can take anything from one to seven hours, and fines recovered from 1997 to date total some £1.8 million; with 56 cases still outstanding.

The number of fisheries offences detected by the Royal Navy are not recorded in a way which would enable details of time spent in Welsh waters to be provided without incurring disproportionate costs. However, DEFRA has given us information on the total number of patrol days and inspections at sea undertaken by the Royal Navy in British fishery limits adjacent to England and Wales, and other waters. Boardings are only one aspect of the fisheries monitoring and surveillance work undertaken by the Royal Navy and are not separately costed. Many small fishing vessels may be stopped during transit trips through Welsh waters by RN patrol vessels, although these may not necessarily be recorded as boardings.

The two Welsh Sea Fisheries Committees (SFCs) enforce their own byelaws and Regulating Orders out to six miles and on land. They also enforce limited UK legislation on net sizes and minimum landing sizes. SFCs are funded by local authorities.

Detection incidents by Sea Fisheries Committees can involve a number of persons and offences within each incident report, and many offences are determined by warnings, which are not detailed in the information provided.

The questions and answers are attached at annex A.
